maritime boundary

Sunrise and set a 50-year timetable for negotiating a permanent sea boundary.

Dili had taken the dispute to the Permanent Court of Arbitration, an intergovernmental organization based at The Hague, which ordered compulsory arbitration between the two parties.

The court announced last year the countries had reached an agreement "on the central elements of a maritime boundary delimitation between them in the Timor Sea", adding that details would remain confidential until the deal was finalized.

The two governments are to meet in New York at the United Nations headquarters on March 6 to sign the new maritime boundary treaty, the statement said.

Timor Leste had been pushing for the building of an onshore processing plant to boost its economy rather than a floating plant.

According to media reports, Timor Leste could receive up to 80 percent of revenues, but could agree to less if gas is piped to a terminal in the tiny country.

The Sunrise joint venture, led by Woodside, said it was aware the two governments have agreed to a new boundaries treaty.

"We hope that the Commission's conclusions and the signing of the treaty will help to provide the fiscal and regulatory certainty required to develop Greater Sunrise for the benefit of all parties," said a Sunrise joint venture spokeswoman said in an email.

Australian and Timor Leste officials were not immediately available for comment.

China has vowed to tackle roblems of forced confessions, hysical abuse and torture in its iminal justice system. It regurly rejects criticisms of its huan rights record, saying China is country with a rule of law.

In 2017, ill-treatment by the hinese authorities may have dictly contributed to the deaths Nobel Peace Prize winner Liu aobo and rights activist Yang ngyan, according to a report leased on Monday by the Hong ng-based advocacy group Chise Human Rights Defenders.

"Many Chinese human rights fenders revealed in 2017 that ey had been tortured by poe during secret detention un- 'residential surveillance at a signated location'," the report ds. "The government continl its persecution of human rights lawyers and obstructed their efforts to conduct their professional activities independent of government interference. Such lawyers soldiered on even as they remained at high risk of losing their licenses and being harassed, physically assaulted, detained and criminally prosecuted.

"State authorities continued to harass and threaten reprisals against activists and lawyers seeking to engage with UN rights bodies.

"Chinese authorities promoted "cyberspace sovereignty" and further tightened restrictions on freedom of expression and information online. Highly sophisticated cyber controls on free speech were ramped up in 2017, making it even riskier than before for HRDs to speak out about rights abuses and conduct advocacy work. Many HRDs in 2017 faced detention or stood trial for online speech, particularly expression over issues that the government considers 'politically sensitive', including expressions of mourning for Liu Xiaobo's death or views about the 19th Party Congress and Xi Jinping's consolidation of his power."

BEIRUT, LEBANON

Air strikes on the last pocket of Islamic State (IS) jihadists in eastern Syria on Sunday killed at least 25 civilians, including seven children, while elsewhere in the country a child died after a suspected chemical attack, sources reported early on Monday.

The strikes were conducted on and around the village of Al-Shaafah, north of the former IS bastion of Albu Kamal on the eastern bank of the Euphrates River near the border with Iraq, the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said. The head of the Britain-based Observatory, Rami Abdel Rahman, said the air strikes were carried out by the United States-led coalition.

"Twenty-five civilians, including seven children, were killed in the village of Al-Shaafah and in surrounding desert areas in coalition strikes all through Sunday," he said. "This village is in the last pocket controlled by IS in the east of Syria."

Air strikes against jihadist forces holding out in remote areas of Deir Ezzor province have killed dozens of civilians in recent weeks, many of them relatives of the fighters. Coalition-backed Kurdish-led forces have been trying to flush out IS from the east bank of the Euphrates, while Russian-backed regime and allied forces are stationed west of the river. Abdel Rahman could not say how many IS combatants were taken out by the latest wave of air strikes.

"IS now holds less than 3 percent of Syrian territory," he said.

The self-styled "caliphate" IS and Iraq in 2014 effectively died when anti-jihadist forces retook its de facto capital Raqa and other strongholds late last year.

However, the US-led coalition has continued to carry out strikes against small pockets of IS fighters hunkering down in and around small villages in Deir Ezzor province. Small groups of IS-affiliated fighters are also still active in other parts of Syria.

Meanwhile, a child died and at least 13 other people suffered breathing difficulties after a suspected chemical attack on a besieged Syrian rebel enclave in Eastern Ghouta on Sunday, a medic and a monitor said.

The Observatory said 14 civilians suffered breathing difficulties after a regime warplane struck the village of Al-Shifuniyah. One child died and a woman was in a critical condition, said Rami Abdel Rahman, head of the Observatory, which relies on multiple sources on the ground.

Yaqub, a doctor who treated those affected, told AFP he suspected "chemical weapons, probably a chlorine gas attack" and a 3-year-old had died of asphyxiation. "Most of the patients have chlorine odor from their clothes and their skin. Many have dyspnea and skin and eye irritations."

Rebels accused Damascus of using chlorine gas, but Moscow, a staunch ally of President Bashar al-Assad's regime, accused his opponents of using "toxic substances" to make it appear that they had been deployed by regime forces. Damascus has repeatedly denied using chemical weapons. Russia accused rebels of carrying out the attack.
